DISSERTATION:

Lyric Cities: Poet, Performance, and Community

My dissertation analyzes how archaic Greek poets imagined and appealed to their home communities. Archaic Greece (ca. 800–480 BCE) was a time of great political and social change as interactions between the various autonomous Greek city-states intensified. Recent research has emphasized how poets helped these communities negotiate their local identities within this growing network of Greek states. I expand on this research by focusing on the role a poet's own local identity plays in establishing their persona. Using Benedict Anderson's concept of "imagined communities," I examine how poets in their works imagined their own local city-state as opposed to those abroad. I demonstrate that a poet's home community is not just a simple biographical fact; it also functions as a way to identify and invest poets with authority. I argue there are important differences in a poet's persona when they perform within their own community as opposed to other communities. I show what rhetorical tropes poets use to appeal to their own fellow citizens rather than an audience of foreigners.
